Rusty Meeting is a lightweight and comprehensive piece of video conferencing software that uses code from SocketCoder. The application allows you to view feeds from your camera as well as from a remote one at the same time. Why would someone not want to use VideoGoblin? I have had that application installed on my system for several years as a work tool and it is one of the best. Why would VideoCandy be better than VideoGoblin? Why would someone not want to use VideoGoblin? I have had that application installed on my system for several years as a work tool and it is one of the best. Why would VideoCandy be better than VideoGoblin? Ask not why VideoCandy is better than VideoGoblin; ask why VideoGoblin is NOT better than VideoCandy. And while you're at it, please tell me exactly what VideoGoblin does that VideoCandy doesn't. VideoGoblin is what VideoCandy got rid of, so VideoGoblin must be better. At least it's far more polished. VideoCandy was never any good, it was always missing some important feature, any time you found that missing feature, no matter how important it was, you had to pay for a license upgrade to have it. It is telling that you consider video conferencing, which is where video goblin shines, a poor use of the term "video conferencing". You don't trust yourself to make the decisions that VideoCandy allowed you to make. One of the only potentially useful features of VideoGoblin that I have seen is that it allows you to click a button on your screen to start recording a new video. It does not offer a good way of organizing the videos you want to keep, especially when you have thousands of hours of video to sort through. If VideoGoblin were developed by VideoCandy, it would be likely have been a file sharing service. It is not surprising then that VideoGoblin kept getting sued by video rights holders. One of the only potentially useful features of VideoGoblin that I have seen is that it allows you to click a button on your screen to start recording a new video.
