Soybean breeding has resulted in significant improvements in yield potential, stability of yield, adaptation of the species to mechanical harvest, and yield protection through improved disease resistance. Due to the nature of plant science agriculture, broadly defined as a manipulation of available plant resources to meet the needs of the growing human population, the environment in which plants are grown for agricultural production continuously offers new obstacles to agricultural production. Each new variety, or cultivar, released to agricultural production is selected for the purpose of increasing yield resulting from increased disease resistance to prevalent diseases, or from direct or indirect improvement in yield potential or efficiency of production. Selection in development programs is generally followed by progressively more severe phenotyping tests. Thus, a form of breeding may result in a series of varieties, or lineages, each of which may further include one or more breeding lines or other specialty types. New varieties or breeding lines are tested and compared to other varieties or lines, sometimes for a number of years, before the selection of the final variety or line. The varieties or lines selected for inclusion in new breeding programs are bred between existing germplasm and new breeding lines are developed from the breeders' selection of the new germplasm. New varieties or lines form a feral population, which is maintained as part of the active breeding program and are referred to in the breeding program by a variety name. Breeders commonly name the new varieties, or names chosen to hint at some particular feature of the new variety. Thus, there can be more than one record of the same variety in more than one place. New soybean varieties or lines, as well as plant varieties or lines derived from work with soybean plants, are the products of the breeding programs of the development societies or organizations, which develop soybean varieties or lines or work with soybean plants from variety development. These breeding programs create considerable work for the organization, which must test a large number of newly created varieties or lines, which may 6d1f23a050
